- (1) Jeff Clark found an adventure and a challenge at Half Moon Bay. He had no one to share his adventure with, so he took on the challenge and rose to the occasion alone. For fifteen years, even when others heard of Clark's feats they did not believe him, but this never stopped him. Jeff Clark continued to surf some of the largest waves in the entire world and he surfed them without any supervision, rescue team, or recognition.

- (10) Just the word "Mavericks" strikes fear into most surfers. The water in Northern California is freezing cold. At Half Moon Bay, where the famed Mavericks waves are located, the rocks are jagged and the ice-cold surf crashes against them with so much force it is as though the surf is fighting against the rocks. The waves there are over seven meters tall, and amongst the largest in the world. Jeff Clark, a native of Half Moon Bay and surfing enthusiast, set out to conquer the giant waves at Mavericks.

- (20) No surfer in the history of the sport has ever been more personally connected to one surf spot than Jeff Clark. At first, no one believed Clark about the size of the waves. At the time, it was a commonly held belief that the largest waves in the world were in Hawaii. It was believed that waves the size of those at Mavericks were simply non-existent. Finally, Clark was able to convince some friends from Southern California to come up to Half Moon Bay and surf.

- (30) Tragically, one of the best surfers in the world lost his life almost immediately after the surf spot at Mavericks started gaining popularity. Mark Foo, a legendary Hawaiian big wave surfer, died on the first wave he ever surfed at Mavericks. He was experienced and had even competed professionally, but Mavericks is so dangerous that even the best of the best can easily be overcome. Foo's death, while tragic, added to the legendary quality of the surf spot and it gained notoriety in the fallout.

- (1) Most camouflage is meant to disguise or hide someone or something from view. Military uniforms, for example, are meant to make it difficult for the enemy to see the soldier they are fighting against. The uniforms are made to blend into the surroundings, such that if the soldiers are fighting in a snowy area the uniforms are white, and if the soldiers are fighting in a forested area the uniforms are green or brown. Tanks, airplanes, and all other military devices are often camouflaged in the same way.
- (5) In World War One and World War Two, however, a different type of camouflage was employed.

- Dazzle camouflage is an interesting idea that was developed at the outbreak of the First World War. The giant battleships in the oceans had a problem. Depending on the weather conditions the ships might be well camouflaged or entirely without camouflage. No methods were successful in creating a universal camouflage that worked no matter the weather conditions, so a new type of camouflage was created.

- (20) Dazzle camouflage is flamboyant. The ships were painted with a wide variety of colors. They were striped or painted with sweeping geometric shapes. Some of the ships looked like giant zebras on the water. Thus, rather than disguise the ships, the ships were made to stand out. The elaborate designs and colors made finding the range of the ships very difficult for the enemy. It was difficult to relay the size of the ship, the type of ship, or to determine how far away the ship was from the viewer. It is difficult to say how effective this technique was in actually reducing the danger posed by enemy ships, but it is clear that these designs raised morale amongst the soldiers on board the ships because they felt that their ship was properly camouflaged. Also, when the ship stopped in ports, crowds rushed to see the beautifully colored ships. It is often claimed that this type of unique camouflage was the basis for more modern camouflage, so while ships today do not employ this type of camouflage, the legacy of "dazzle" lives on.

- (1) Fire breathing is a deadly but fascinating spectacle. Fire breathers generally introduce a substance that is flammable into their mouth. Then they spew the substance at an existing fire, often a torch, and a giant flame is created in the air. The act, while beautiful if done correctly, has many terrible side effects such as burning oneself, burning an audience member, or inhaling the toxic substance in one's mouth. There are, however, safety measures that reduce these risks dramatically.
- (5)
- (10) First, the substance used to create the fire will only ignite the large flame if it is spewed out in a fine mist. The safest of all the substances, perhaps, is paraffin oil. Paraffin oil is mostly used for lamps, but certain types of this oil fit fire breathing. Paraffin oil has a high flash point. This means that it burns very easily and quickly. This is important for fire breathers because it means that the flame will be large and can be controlled to a certain degree. Conversely, alcohol has a lower flash point and thus more alcohol is needed for a larger flame. Using a fuel with a higher flash point reduces the risk of burning oneself.
- (15)
- (20)
- Next, the fire breather must take into account wind. Wind will have an effect on the direction of the fire as well as the direction the fuel is spewed. Clearly, fire breathers should never practice their art in windy situations. Wind could potentially push a fire toward an audience member or even lead to the burning of a structure. Thus, practicing fire breathing in a place with little wind is critical. Also, fire breathers must have a good knowledge of the size of the flame they will create. Fire breathers can easily predict how large their flame will be, and they can station the audience a safe distance away. Fire breathing in areas which are not windy as well as keeping the audience a good distance away reduces the risk of burning an audience member.

- (35) Finally, while not much can be done to prevent inhalation of smoke or other chemicals, discipline in practice can greatly reduce the issue of toxic substances in one's mouth. It is generally a good idea not to perform a fire breathing act too often and to exercise extreme caution when doing so. Other good tips include wearing clothes that are fire retardant and, for men, not wearing a beard. If these steps are taken fire breathing can be as safe as possible and audiences can be free from worry and enjoy the spectacle.

- (5) instead robots or actors that are exact duplicates of your friends and family. Clearly this is incorrect, but people who suffer from Capgras syndrome have a delusion in which they believe that all the people they are familiar with have been replaced by imposters.
- (10) This strange disorder occurs largely in patients that suffer brain injuries or schizophrenia. It is unknown exactly what causes it, although speculation about face perception is widespread. Most people can recognize many faces and can interpret emotions based on facial expressions. Even
- (15) people who are deaf can easily understand mood and tone of a speaker by facial expressions. Many scientists who study Capgras syndrome believe that somehow the brain has been altered in such a way as to alter the identification of faces. Thus, sufferers of Capgras delusion can recognize
- (20) the people they see but they do not associate this recognition with the actual person. So, for example, a sufferer may see and recognize his mother, but still believe that somehow it is not actually his mother that he sees.
- In acute cases, those who have Capras syndrome might
- (25) confuse one person for another while believing one person specifically is an imposter. For example, a husband may believe his wife is an imposter and his memories of his wife are actually connected to a long deceased relative. Thus, he would only misidentify the wife, while everyone else
- (30) would be properly identified. Additionally, the husband could speak to the wife on the phone and believe he is actually speaking to his wife and then upon meeting her believe she is an imposter.

While this disorder is extremely rare, it can be debilitating.

- (35) The patient suffering from the syndrome often expresses missing their friends and family because they believe they have been replaced. Conversely, the friends and family of the patient are frustrated by their loved one's reaction to them. Scientists do not seem close to any kind of
- (40) breakthrough in solving the riddle of Capgras syndrome, but perhaps one day it will be possible to map the brain more thoroughly and determine what can be done to cure it.

- (1) One of the most famous thriller and suspense writers of all time is Robert Ludlum. Ludlum's books have been called "airport novels", because they are often purchased and read during travel, especially on airplanes. This designation, however, has a negative connotation as poorly written fiction and it does not do justice to Ludlum's literary skill. Ludlum's writing is among the best suspense writing ever, largely due to his life experience.

- (10) Robert Ludlum has been praised for his excellent use of dialogue. Ludlum's background as an actor led him to understand speech patterns, and he became highly skilled at writing dialogue in a way that was both organic and effective. Suspense, in Ludlum's books, is often based on some type of military-like operation. Ludlum himself was in the United States Marines, and his experiences there led to writing that was exciting and seemingly plausible.
- (15) While he was a Marine, critics have often noted that the accuracy of his descriptions of fire arms were largely unsuccessful, as he seems to have had limited knowledge on the subject of guns. Regardless of this small criticism, Ludlum succeeded, for the most part, in weaving his fiction stories with accurate information. This gave his readers the sense that what they were reading was factual and realistic. Realism in suspense and thriller novels is a skill with which most authors struggle, but Robert Ludlum was masterful in his ability to weave fact and fiction so seamlessly together.

- (20) Many of Robert Ludlum's books were made into movies.
- (25) The Bourne Trilogy, which is a series of three books using the same main character, was made into three very popular films. Ludlum died in 2001, but his name has been used as a trademark. This means that other authors can write books in the same style as Ludlum and they can be published under Ludlum's name. This is known as ghostwriting. Books, such as these, are meant to carry on a tradition of suspense and thriller writing that Ludlum mastered.
